Tonbo Imaging the David among defence Goliaths

Start-up wins multi-million dollar indigenisation deal for anti-tank missiles

PEERZADA ABRAR
Bengaluru, 14 February

Unless you are one of the biggest contractors, defence is a tough business to crack. But Tonbo Imaging, a night-vision start-up backed by investors such as Artiman and Qualcomm Ventures, is clinching defence deals despite all odds.

The Bengaluru-based firm has won a large deal from Bharat Dynamics (BDL) to indigenise new missile seekers for the multi-million dollar anti-tank guided missiles that BDL is building for the Indian Army.

For Tonbo, it is an opportunity to tap the over $500-million market in the next few years.

"We signed up with BDL to supply the EO-IR (electro-optical-infrared) seeker and command launcher unit (CLU) that control and launch the missile and engage with the target before launch," said Ankit Kumar, co-founder at Tonbo Imaging. "We, along with BDL, are integrating the CLU and seeker with the missile. BDL will supply the end system to the Army."

This is a Make-II programme, in which players willing to invest upfront and indigenously design and develop missiles are only qualified to participate.

Tonbo has to show 60 per cent Indian content and prove that the design is indigenous. So, any foreign solution also has to first prove indigenisation and acquire all design and IPR (intellectual property rights) within India.

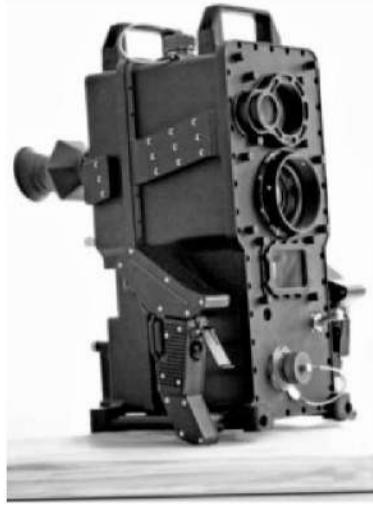

BDL is the front-runner meeting all the requirements and has all the necessary capabilities required in the expression of interest (EOI).

What differentiates Tonbo is that before launch of the missile, the target is acquired by the CLU.

The target picture is handed over to the missile seeker, and once fired, the missile — with Tonbo's eyes and brain (seeker) — homes in on the target with centimetre-level precision.

This is called fire-and-forget missile launch. It is unlike older generation missile systems, which are wire guided and missile control is with the gunner even after it is fired. Also, the missile is manually manoeuvred towards the target.

In the fire-and-forget system, once
